Montanaro found guilty of plagiarizing research paper

An academic honesty committee found Student Body Vice President Don Montanaro guilty last week of plagiarizing a major research paper, sources told The Observer.

Montanaro was ordered to rewrite the paper on a different topic or face the full-semester course, said a source, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Two other Notre Dame students, who were working with Montanaro on the group project, were also found guilty of plagiarizing, the source said.

Montanaro would not discuss details about the committee's decision to the dean of the college, Montanaro and the two students are apparently not appealing.

"I have indicated publicly that there was a charge of plagiarism in my class and that the charge was sent to the department's honesty committee," said Leege, who declined further comment.

The source said Montanaro plagiarized by copying from publications and not documenting where the information came from.

Montanaro and the students' punishment entails that they must get the equivalent of a "B" on the paper they are to rewrite, the source said. No matter what grade they normally would receive on the paper, however, they still will get a failing grade on it.

"This is a college matter," he said.

University Vice President for Student Affairs Father David Tyson was attending meetings Tuesday and could not be reached for comment.

Student leaders agree that last semester's unfortunate alcohol-related accidents probably will deter students from drinking and driving than any awareness programs can ever do.

"For most of us, it's like a brick over the head. You can't hit two more close to home than that," said Jeanne Heller, Saint Mary's student body president.

But with the death of Zahm Hall junior Mark Hendricks as well as a constant reminder, Heller and other leaders are renewing alcohol awareness efforts with extra zeal on both campuses.

For Vince Willis, vice president of the Notre Dame chapter of BACCHUS, a national group which promotes responsible drinking, it's a chance to gain more active support for his group's ideas.

"Since the accidents, everyone has been more willing to talk about the alcohol problem on campus," Willis said. "The whole University has been very supportive of BACCHUS," he said.

Willis, who also manages Theodore's, said more than 300 students belong to BACCHUS nationwide. Notre Dame is one of the new members, officially joining earlier this year.

At the group's annual meetings, he and representatives from other campuses discuss ideas, events and programs which occur in dealing with the national crisis of alcohol and drug addiction, Willis said.

Willis then returns to Notre Dame and Saint Mary's, where programs such as next week's alcohol awareness program turn from ideas into reality.

"There's no easy solution to the problem of drunk driving," Willis said. "You can't expect all the people they can't drink."

Willis said BACCHUS' goals are realistic, because they are based on the premise that students always will drink alcohol.

"We're acknowledging that alcohol is part of the social life here," he said. "We're saying it's not bad to drink, if drinking is done responsibly."

Specifically, the group plans to promote alcohol education inside and outside the Notre Dame classroom, similar to classes and discussions in the Saint Mary's classroom.

A car returning home from an off-campus party strikes a pedestrian early one Saturday morning on South Bend Avenue not far from two popular student bars.

The driver pulls over and walks over to the scene. Slowly a small crowd forms.

The victim, also a Notre Dame student, is taken to St. Joseph's Hospital. Unconsciously, she suffered a one-hour lapse of memory, facial cuts and bruises, and broken upper and lower jaws.

The 20-year-old student was driving the car that morning now looks back on the incident as an ordeal of guilt and fear.

"Just knowing that I could do something like that. That's what I kept thinking - how could I do something like that?"
Fired friend not perfect but will be missed by at least one

A friend of mine told me last night that he no longer employed. He did not quit, even though he knew that continuing to work in the position he held jeopardized his future in the business. To him, quitting was something he could not even consider; it meant giving up, and he would never give up on a commitment he had undertaken.

And so he continued to work, hoping things between him and the management would somehow get better. But they didn’t, and yesterday my friend told me he had been fired.

Anyone who has ever experienced a firing knows how devastating it can be. It is not just the loss of a paycheck and the security a salary brings; this was not a problem for my friend, who has already obtained other employment.

Being fired is more a loss of an identity; you are no longer part of an organization by which you defined yourself. You no longer have a place where you are needed for your own personal abilities, and that can leave you feeling adrift and mentality like a failure.

In the case of my friend, anyone who ever worked with or under him knows this is simply not true. Vince Lombardi once said, “If you’re lucky enough find a guy with a lot of head and a lot of heart, he’s never going to come off the field second.” Judged by these standards, my friend lost nothing more than his position, because he began to live out of himself into everything he undertook than he did.

Sometimes that got him into trouble; it was probably the characteristic which got him fired. Because he had such enthusiasm for the work he did, because he held such high standards for himself, he often demanded more from his colleagues and employees than it seemed he had a right to. His own confidence that he would succeed in anything he attempted might have been considered cockiness, and was often a source of friction between him and others. But it was also an infectious quality that imbued his staff with the same assurance.

I remember the time he told me about a project that had to be completed in a four-hour deadline, a project that was involved and important that most people thought it could not be done within such stringent time limits. Not only did his staff finish the job in the record time he had set, but they produced some of their best work. And I know my friend was there from beginning to end, doing as much as everyone else and giving them the confidence to succeed. I also remember the times he called and told me about mechanical problems in his office, problems which he often worked late into the night to correct. There was no recognition in these hours of overtime work and little reward other than the personal satisfaction which comes from a job well done. But that was enough for my friend, and it kept him going when most people would have given up.

I don’t mean to make this man sound like the perfect worker, or some kind of hero for managing to get fired from his job. I know he might have been difficult to work with, and I can only imagine what it would have been like to be his boss. I suppose I’ll never know all the reasons why he was relieved of his duties; that is something between him and his boss, and I don’t pretend to know the answers.

I do know that he’ll be missed by those he worked with. And if you’re wondering why I’m writing this article, telling you about a friend of mine who lost his job just like thousands of other people in thousands of offices all over the country, I guess that’s the reason. I guess I hope he’ll get a chance to read this, and that he’ll know he will be missed.
It's official at last: Hiler wins

Associated Press

WARSAW, Ind. - Rep. John Hiler, R-Ind., won the recount of the nation's closest congressional race Tuesday by 47 votes and returned to Washington to resume work in the 99th Congress. The final tally presented to the State Recount Commission showed Hiler with 75,979 votes and Democratic challenger Thomas Ward with 75,932 votes.

Hiler won the Nov. 4 election by 26 votes for the 6th District seat vacated by late Rep. James Oberstar, D-Minn. Hiler led with 135,411 votes and Oberstar with 134,978 votes.

"It took 77 days, but the original (election) certificate is reaffirmed," Hiler said.

Secretary of State Evan Bayh, the chairman of the bipartisan recount commission, said the three-member panel will hold a formal vote Friday to confirm Hiler's victory.

"It's pro forma. Nothing's going to change," he said.

Ward's campaign manager, Mike Marshall, said Ward would hold a news conference Wednesday to discuss his future. Marshall refused to say whether Ward would run again for Congress in 1988.

"They can say, 'This is the law. And this is what happened to me.' " Screen added.

"They can raise consciousness on this issue," he said.

The driver of the car that hit him said her immediate thoughts after the accident were of the victim.

"Everyone was so supportive of me. I was concerned more about Craig than anything," said Screen, father of three.

"It's gotta stop. It's terrible," said Screen.

"I honestly don't think students think about what's happened to other people."

Gundersen claims the experience has increased his own awareness about drunk driving. He described the mentality towards drunk driving of his friends back home in Wisconsin as very lax.

"Because of the three accidents that occurred at Notre Dame last year, I think the students here have greater awareness," he said.

Greater general awareness is something the driver of the car thinks could help end the problem of drunk driving. "It will take more than people saying this could happen to them," he said.

"It's not something I take lightly any more," she said. "It's gotta stop. It's terrible, what's happened so far."

As part of her punishment, she will be required to give five lectures on her experience. She said her message will be "It happened, you make mistakes, you don't let it happen again."

"I'm not such a terrible person," she said. "But I did a terrible thing."

Time to take action for HPC

The Hall Presidents' Council last night formed a special committee to discuss solutions to alcohol-related campus problems.

"We don't have any definite answers, but if we talk about it, maybe we can identify some of the possible solutions," said HPC Chairman Joanie Cahill. "It's time for us to take some kind of action," she said.

"We're at the point in society today where many of the most crucial problems can be directly or indirectly related to alcohol," said Vince Willis, vice-president of the Notre Dame chapter of BACCHUS, who spoke at the meeting.

"Although the administration has been very helpful in the efforts to increase alcohol awareness on campus, we can't look to the administration to solve the problem," Willis said. "It has to start here with us."

"The key to success is the cooperation of the halls," Willis said.

workshops used at Saint Mary's. According to Heller, the psychology class "Social and Problem Drinking" has met with success in the last two years, with a large waiting list each semester. The class is purposely limited to about 25 students, however, for more personalized instruction.

The College also sponsors alcohol awareness programs, such as the four-day program held last November. "Each of the information sessions were packed during that week," Heller said. "So we know people are attending the programs."

"We try to provide alcohol education and social alternatives to drinking off-campus. But then it comes down to an individual response," Heller said. "We do what we can."

Heller said she and the class presidents plan to write a letter to Saint Mary's students encouraging them to participate in more non-alcoholic alternatives.

One such alternative, Willis said, is Theodore's, which in its first few months has attracted almost 1,000 students each weekend night.

"We've got to commend the administration on that. They stepped in on a big problem and did something about it," he said, referring to the need for an underground alternative to hall parties at the onset of the alcohol policy.

Dear Editor:

When I got back from break there was a hand painted card addressed to the World Hunger Coalition in the mailbox with a simple message: “Many blessings for the new year.” What this box with a simple message: “Many blessings for the new year.” What this symbolized, though, ran much deeper than cultural differences and distance. It showed the universality of kindness that runs deeper than cultural differences and distance.

This young girl, along with hundreds of others throughout the world, was helped by the sacrifice and generosity of those people in the Wednesday Lunch Past. While this fast may appear to be a meaningless effort towards some unforeseeable end, it does make a substantial difference in the lives of many people.

This past semester 600 faster raised $5,856 which will be distributed throughout the world. Our organization is presently the only group with this kind of actual money will be donated. In the past, the money went primarily to Iraq, Iran, to the Green Revolution in that country and the growing needs in parts of Africa and Latin America, our giving patterns are gradually answering those needs. Our thanks to all those who fasted this past semester. Please continue your generous and necessary support.

Peace must be sought in Iranian war region

Dear Editor:

Anyone who has read the article written by Brian Murray on Reagan’s genius in foreign policy-making, and who has some knowledge on what is going on in the Middle East, will find that many of the statements made have no ground and are misleading.

Donoebury

Garry Trudeau

The holidays have come and gone and a new year is upon us. For many it is a welcome opportunity to put the ups and downs of the last behind us and begin anew. But in our eagerness to move on, there is one event which, more than any other, we should not forget – our history.

First, he states that “if Iraq wins, Russia will have an excuse to invade Iran to secure its borders.” Murray has no explanation whatsoever as to why this is so. In any case Iraq has no intention of winning the war, that is, of invading Iran. In fact, Iraq has again and again offered to make peace with Iran. On the other hand, I do not see how Iran, which is smaller in size and largely outnumbered in population by the Iranians, could invade and control Iran.

Secondly, Murray specifically states that “an Iranian loss could only destabilize the Middle.” On the contrary, if Iran wins the war against Iraq, it will destabilize the Persian Gulf states by encouraging the Moslem fanatics, who are growing in number, to control these states. A good example of the go-on-activities of these groups is the coup that failed in Bahrain a few years ago and the attempt on the life of Emir of Kuwait.

As I see it, it would be in the interest of America to find a way to end the war between Iran and Iraq and to bring peace to the area. This certainly would not materialize by selling weapons to Iran. As a matter of fact, selling weapons would help Iran to continue its efforts to invade Iraq and at the same time encourage it to carry out more acts of terrorism. Only peace will cure the flood of oil to the world and end suffering and bloodshed of the peoples of Iran and Iraq.

I suggest that those who attempt to analyze such a complicated subject have a better understanding of the situation by going on in that part of the world and a humanitarian drive for promoting peace rather than war.

Equal Honor
That we need to move on, there is one lesson which, as the future of society, I hold ourselves accountable, if we do not every move and hounding us about our drinking habits. No longer will we find a bounty of alcohol the same as part of a conscious learning experience, not out of fear of our problems. Of those who are students will soon be a more influential part of society and no longer hiding in the shadow of the dome. No longer will a lengthy document inform us of how and when we may consume alcohol.

First, he states that “if Iraq wins, it is not the solution to our problem. Policy or not, alcohol consumption will be encouraged to make peace with Iraq.” Murray specifically states that “If Iran wins the war against Iraq, it will destabilize the Persian Gulf states by encouraging the Moslem fanatics, who are growing in number, to control these states.”

As I see it, it would be in the interest of America to find a way to end the war between Iran and Iraq and to bring peace to the area. This certainly would not materialize by selling weapons to Iran. Equal Honor and four weeks of living with an active volunteer site, of stoves. During training we learned the skills necessary to function somewhat normally in our new jobs and cultural do's and don'ts. You are in this experience apart. You are in this experience to make any type of comparison which one can be so in control of one's own agenda. You can set your own goals and responsibilities far better than at any entry-level position with a stateside firm. But there are sacrifices one must make to join Peace Corps. One must be willing to part with most of the American creature comforts. You must learn to deal with frustration and occasional boredom as things move much slower than most volunteers would like. And one must be able to put all home front personal relationships in their proper perspective; there is not a lot that can be done to ease the discomfort of two people who find it difficult to be thousands of miles apart. You are in this experience with both feet whether you like it or not. The opportunity to experience a different culture from the ground level cannot be matched. For me I can see my views on Third World development changing as I experience not only different ways in which people live, but entirely new ways in which people think. I doubt I will ever look at anything with a completely American perspective again.

One of my friends from home asked me in a recent letter if my host family was "typical" French. I laughed when I read that and smiled even wider when I read her next line, "What is typical French anyway?" I have been trying to figure that out since I came here.

People are people (even in France)

Mary Berger

C'est la Vie

Before I arrived, "typical" French to me was an old man sporting a beret with a cigarette hanging out of his mouth, riding a bike and carrying a loaf of bread and a bottle of wine. I have come to the conclusion that that image is very French.

There are other "typical" French characteristics. Taking a three-hour lunch break for a long leisurely meal with one's family is one example. We are issued from noon to approximately 3:00 p.m. Restaurants are in business during these hours but then close until 7:00 p.m. rings in the dinner hour.

The patisseries-boulangeries one sees and smells everywhere are also an important part of most French people's days. In addition to picking up a fresh dessert or fresh bread, neighbors run into each other and chitchat.

"Typical" French students sometimes carry a heavy class load, frequent cafés, bars and discos during the week, and return home for the weekends. Very few students live in dormitories and little, if any, campus life exists. Students board with families or share apartments and find their excitement in town.

In spite of the differences from American life cited here, French people and the French way of life are not that different from Americans and our mode of living. The language may be different, the food may be different, and other superficial aspects of life may be different, but day-to-day living, growing and experiencing are the same.

People go to school and to work, they come home to their families and dirty dishes, they watch television and go to movies, they celebrate the birth of a new baby and they mourn the loss of any life.

Whether they live on one side of the Atlantic or the other, whether they are Catholic or atheist, whether they have brown hair or blond, people are people. So let's hope it's not always like Depeche Mode puts it, "that we should get along so awfully."

Everybody has a realistic shot with Rozelle’s ideal schedule. Someone, Rozelle will see his version of utopia: all NFL teams finishing at 8-4. He surely has enough great jobs that eliminating dynasties, hasn’t he? Hmmm.

It’s true that dynasties are a thing of the past, but it is not because of Rozelle. It is the future of today’s sports. There are a number of reasons for this inability to repeat. Some are easy to understand. Injuries and bad breaks are often at fault. Some others are more disturbing, and increasingly prominent, like drug problems, loss of motivation and salary bickering.

It is evident that with the makeup of today’s sports, a team merely has to capture the ever elusive spark that remarkably brings everything together for that team and carries it to the top of its sport in a given year. The catch is that once a team ever achieves this, the probability of it slipping out of its hands is very high. In 1987, the Giants and the Bears were presented kept their unending lineup of patsies they are so great, why are there a number of reasons for this?... it is not allowed to have that experience. There used to be an after-game introduced me to what we work on in practice to contribute to this team. If we have some success, I would like to make the NCAA Tournament, not so much to win a championship, but as Coach Phelps uses the Blue Dock was plenty effective. As a senior, he averaged 17.3 points and 4.4 rebounds per game, and participated in the Decker-Dunne game in Pittsburg. But as always, the move to college basketball required some adjustments. There used to be an after-game commercial in which a man would get a slap in his face and say, "Thanks, I needed that." For Notre Dame freshman center Scott Padock, Western Kentucky acted as the slap, and he believes he certainly did need that.

"The Western Kentucky game introduced me to what college basketball would be like," he says. "I think I’ve done pretty well since then." Few could argue. Beginning with his two-point, three-rebound performance in the season opener, the 6-9 Padock has averaged 2.5 points and 4.1 rebounds in 15.3 minutes of playing time. But his real progress has come on the defensive end.

"When I came here, the coaches told me to concentrate on rebounding and defense," he says. "I think I’ve improved in those areas, but I need to work on my offensive skills to be effective at this level." At the high school level, Padock was plenty effective. As a senior, he averaged 17.3 points and 4.4 rebounds per game, and participated in the Decker-Dunne game in Pittsburg. But as always, the move to college basketball required some adjustments. "At this level, everyone is just as big as I am," says Padock. "That means I have to do the little things to be effective. I have to make contact, box out and go up and get the ball." But Padock has had a helpful hand in making these adjustments. He and other big men have the benefit of working with assistant coach John Stumate. Padock says he has enjoyed that experience. "It’s incredible," says the Elway, is the team of the future. We’ve gone through too many teams that never turn potential into production. Next year, Denver’s try for another dramatic drive to pull out a miraculous playoff victory will hit a snag. Next year, the Giants will not get great games out of Phil Simms at crucial times, and they will fall out of the playoff race. It may be not be much to look forward to, but these teams will face the same struggles as the changed face of the Giants. They are just a nice version of last year’s Bears. Not quite as interesting, but much easier to tolerate. Don’t tell me Denver, with John Elway, is the team of the future. We’ve gone through too many teams that never turn potential into production.

The Notre Dame women's basketball team dominated the last night, beating Cleveland State 85-66 to improve its record to 4-10 for the year.

The Irish used a large height advantage to outrebound the Vikings by a whopping 46-36 margin. Notre Dame's all-time margin. Notre Dame's all-time advantage," said Irish head coach Mary DiStanislao, "and After losing three dual meets this year because of matches it had to forfeit, the Notre Dame wrestling team finally got its chance to turn the tables last night against Athletes in Action.

Taking advantage of 12 points handed to Notre Dame by Athletes in Action forfeits, and overcoming some lackluster performances, the Irish defeated Athletes in Action, 35-23, at the ACC Pit. Despite the win in the exhibition dual meet, Notre Dame head coach Fran McCann was not pleased with the results, as the Irish won only two of the six meets that were not forfeited.

"I was hoping to win four of six matches; we ended up losing four of six," said McCann. "We gave a couple of matches away that we could have won. I don't think we wrestled very well."

Notre Dame's two winners pulled down 10. Bunek also led all Irish scorers with 22 points, shooting 10-of-16 from the field and two-of-three from the free-throw line. "When Heidi decides to turn it on, she does really well," said DiStanislao. "She created baskets for herself on the fast breaks."

Last night's game also marked the first appearance of Notre Dame's two newest players to the team, Ellen Maier, a 164-pound guard from Mineral Wells, Texas, and Kim Garrison, a 6-0 forward from Mill Creek, Wash. Both saw action last night, although neither scored.

Neither really had a chance to score on a night when Notre Dame's tough defense forced Cleveland State into shooting a woeful .189 (7-of-37) from the floor in the first half. The Irish led 41-27 at halftime. The Irish led 41-27 at the intermission, and although Cleveland State's outside shooters improved their mark a little in the second half scoring over the Irish zone to finish the game at a .278 clip, it was nowhere near enough.

While Notre Dame's traditionally-tough match-up zone defense was causing problems for the Vikings, the Irish offense was rolling to a .522 field-goal percentage for the game. Botham connected on 7-of-11 to chip in 15 points to the Irish cause, while guards Mary Gavin and Diondra Toney each added 11 points.

Super Bowl's a BIG, but one-shot deal

"If the Super Bowl is such a big deal, then why do they play it every year?"

Free-spirited running back Duane Thomas of the Dallas Cowboys uttered these words more than 10 years ago, obviously not agreeing with the rest of America that it should be held sacred. That was just one of the many phases that the Super Bowl has gone through in its previous 39 years.

The game began as a novelty, giving the wild and unpredictable AFL a chance to strut its stuff against the hallowed NFL. Tack on a few Roman numerals for authenticity and we may start a tradition here.

In the first two years, it was no match. The Green Bay Packers disposed of Kansas City and Oakland, and with them, all notions that the AFL was equal to the NFL.

But then some Joe from New York shook up the traditionalists with a promise and a performance that showed that this Super Bowl idea just may cut it after all.

Things went fine until Minnesota started making regular appearances. They managed to turn every game into a rout or a bore. They did more than just look bad, they managed to look worse than some excellent Miami and Pittsburgh teams look bad with them.

When the Viking hex finally was eradicated, the Super Bowl put together some classics. The two Pittsburgh-Dallas matchups will forever be Super Bowl highlights. Who can forget Lynn Swann tossing and catching Terry Bradshaw's bomb out of the end zone? Or Jackie Smith dropping Roger Staubach's flip into it? These were the glory days of the Super Bowl.

But things have changed now, and it is not necessarily good or bad, just different. We still have the trans-Afternoon pre-game shows that tell the viewer everything he wants to know about the teams in the game. Twice. We still have the best of each conference playing each other, the same general idea with which the game originated.

Football has just fallen into the same cycle as both baseball and basketball. It is very hard to repeat as champion. Not since the Steelers won in 1979 and 1980 has a team won consecutive Super Bowls. Most will say this is good. Pete Rozelle wanted parity and parity he is getting, right?
